

CRIS-EXIT 1/4

The global economic crisis has made Spain a bleak landscape with many new built unfinished projects, empty buildings, abandoned structures, plots unbuilt,... using an aggressive urbanism, without any sensitivity to the immediate environment.

This competition allows us to not only reflect on how to act generally on an extension of a building but go further and propose solutions to existing problems by approach the problem from different points of views that generate new ways of discussion relationship between architecture and the city.

Murcia is a médium city in southeastern Spain, dedicated to agriculture, this has been an important economic boost for the region. There has always been a close connection between the city and the countryside, but the planning of recent decades has undermined this model, imposing its rules over those of nature.
